The design principle I found most useful was repetition because it made my presentation consistent and gave it a sense of unity. In Canva, the easiest part for me was applying my branding, while the hardest part was deciding which elements to use for the presentation. Through this process, I learned that visual communication does not need to be complicated, it simply requires the right balance of colors, fonts, and elements to effectively convey your message. Paying attention to these details made my presentation more cohesive and engaging. Overall, I realized that simplicity and consistency are key to clear visual communication.
